

perfect for and need to make a night out of this place. Yes, if you're looking to share what you eat, and have a pleasant, relaxed dinner with friends or family. But if you are at all inclined to a) bitch about the subway ride, b) bitch about how much cheaper you can find falafel and street meat, or c) feel bad for the lamb you are eating – you probably shouldn't bother.

Food Rundown:

Hummus

One of the best servings of hummus we've ever had, and we've had a lot lately. Lemony and perfect. We also love basket full of thin pita covered in za'atar. That sh*t is amazing.

Fried Kibbe

Big balls of fried meat. See the Naya review – these are pretty much exactly the same, and they're really good.

Eggplant Napoleon

Layers of fried eggplant alternating with layers of baba ganouj to make up a perfect dome of deliciousness on a plate. You absolutely need to eat this.

Cauliflower Salad

We heard great things about this cauliflower salad with pomagranite molasses, but found it too sweet and didn't finish it. Some people love it, but it's not our thing.

Stuffed Cabbage

Incredibly delicate cigar shaped cabbage rolls, stuffed with lamb and rice. The cabbage is paper thin, and the lamb perfectly spiced. I could have eaten ten.

Kafta

Possibly the number one favorite dish on the table. This is baked ground lamb that you want to have topped with tahini (rather than the tomato sauce). It's a huge serving, and comes on a plate next to rice with fried onions in it. Amazing.

Brussels Sprouts

Wanna know why these are awesome? Because they're deep fried. Moving right along...

Mini Pies

We ordered the combination of three pies; spinach, meat, and cheese. All were tasty, but on the small side. The circular meat pie was the all around winner and we'd probably go all meat next time around.
